Giving the students support, time to process their experiences, and heavy focus on theories and application.

they are prepared for a practicum site and they have wrap around support from their education system.

Communication lines being open, passionate students and professors.

Good supervision oversight

Ethics/knowledge

The dedication of the faculty to the students success as counselors - in - training

knowledgeable professors

Hands on training. Working directly with staff counselors and supervisors.

I think that the students have a good overall knowledge of counseling theories.

Q7 - In what areas do our interns/graduates need additional training? Please provide specifics.

Reminders that even though the books teach the ideal situation for what therapy "should" look like, they need to have some flexibility in the reality of what walks in the door and is presented to them. Additional time spend on the importance of the rapport building process as a foundation for their treatment with any client to be successful.

More understanding on overall process of beginning and ending sessions and what on-going sessions may look like. Also, students learn ethics and know how important it is to know ethics, but seem to struggle at timew to apply those to some real-life scenarios.

Theory and skill.

to see counseling being done with experienced counselors doing sessions with 1st time clients and ongoing clients.

More intense knowledge of the concepts and techniques in the theoretical models.

transference, countertransference, and professional presentation

I think both needing additional guidance in the intership piece.

Great program!!

Have had best and worst intern from your program so it is hard to generalize these answers

I have had a couple of students come through. The lack of profesionalism from two different practicum professors was staggering. It was so difficult in the last semester that I will no longer take students from Tarleton's counseling program. I have considered our entire agency withdrawing from workting with this particular counseling program.
